

(LCN Connections Issue 6 - February 2013)

BOOK REVIEW

Willis Harman. Global Mind Change

Reviewed by Tip Walker

The book is a fascinating, insightful, and credible account of the global mind change that has been going on for over half a century now and is rapidly accelerating. Harman explains how scientists are fundamentally changing their view of what constitutes reality and how we are moving away from a mechanistic view of how mind and body function. The scientific community is beginning to realize that consciousness exists beyond the physical body and that we are all part of a greater whole. We do not exist in isolation subject to only localized causation. Expressed in more human terms, one person suffering from homelessness, hunger, and emotional trauma in one physical location on the planet affects us all. Harman looks at how this shift in perception is impacting different areas of human activity such as business, health care, and politics. For example, it has become more common for people in the business world to make decisions based on their intuition, though often referred to as “gut feeling.” This new view of reality is much more in line with the world of quantum physics. The new paradigm acknowledges and validates the subjective experiences of people and suggests that we bear a great deal of responsibility for our individual and collective realities. In other words, we are not helpless victims adrift in a cold heartless world, powerless to effect positive change. We are far more powerful beings than we might ever imagine.